

Luma’s Pocket of Questions

An original MimoMango story

Luma had two deep pockets and a question for almost everything. 'Why do leaves curl? Where does wind begin? Do beetles ever get the hiccups?'

Papa could answer some questions. Others made him scratch his feathers. 'Let us take a wondering walk,' he said. Luma brought her very largest pocket.

Under a hazel tree, she found an empty nutshell. 'Who lived in here?' Papa suggested a nut. 'Before the nut?' Luma asked. They looked closer.

They noticed a tiny round hole in another shell. Perhaps something small had eaten supper there. Luma tucked that question into her pocket with the shell.

Beside the pond, round ripples spread across the water. 'What made those?' Luma asked. They waited quietly until a little fish touched the shining surface.

'One answer!' Luma cheered. Then a second thought arrived. 'How far can a ripple travel?' Papa smiled. 'Now we have another thing to watch together.'

At the next bend, Luma opened her pocket. The nutshell had left a dusty patch. Her questions, however, seemed much too large to fit inside it.

'I cannot carry them all,' she said. Papa found a fallen twig. On the soft earth, Luma drew a shell, a fish, and a wiggly line.

The drawings reminded her what she wondered. She did not need to know every answer before supper. Some questions could wait until another wondering walk tomorrow.

Back home, they opened a book about nuts. It showed a small insect with a long snout. Luma leaned close, then inspected her shell once more.

'Perhaps that visitor made my hole,' she said. 'We could look for one tomorrow.' Papa nodded. The empty shell had become the beginning of an adventure.

That night, Luma emptied her pockets. One shell, two crumbs, a feather. Her questions stayed close, ready to open the world a little wider tomorrow morning.
